Newly completed building serves as studio, laboratory for art students

UT Tyler opened a new 4,750 square foot art studio near the west campus entrance. Previously, studio art classes at UT Tyler were held in science laboratories. Plans for the building were coordinated by department chair Donald Van Horn. The studio was designed without air-conditioning, since accumulated particles from art projects might damage traditional cooling systems. In addition to a new studio building, the art department welcomed several new faculty members and equipment donated by community members.
