Search by computer offered by library

Bibliographies and other information may now be retrieved online from nearly 200 databases for library users in almost every field, according to Mrs. Olene Harned, university librarian.

This new library service parallels traditional manual searching in bibliographies and indexes, but has the advantage of speed and up-to-dateness of information. In addition, many of the databases have no printed equivalents or the printed equivalents are not available in the Robert R. Muntz Library.

"For example," Mrs. Harned said, "Inspec, a database for physics, electrical engineering, electronics, computers, and control engineering, is based on Electrical and Electronics Abstracts, Computer and Control Abstracts, and Physics Abstracts, none of which is in the library collection in printed form."

Inspec contains articles from 2,300 journals, 330 of which are abstracted completely. In addition to journal articles this database includes papers, reports, books, theses, etc. This database covers 1969 to the present and is updated monthly with about 15,000 citations each update. Over one-half million records are found in Inspec.

Sample results of searches can be seen in the library and thorough descriptions of each database are available. Librarians operate the terminal for users after discussing the topic to be searched, the likely cost, and the format desired. Abstracts are available in many of the databases.

The average cost of using a database is $1 per minute, and the average time to perform a search is 15-20 minutes. Librarians Ann Bearry and Vicki Betts are the library computer searchers and are available to describe this service and the costs of using it. They are also available to give class demonstrations in the library or talks in the classroom. Classroom demonstrations can be done if both an electrical outlet and a telephone are available.
